(57) Abstract :

The present disclosure relates to a voice recognition based intelligent snooker score board. The board comprises a first camera mounted on a snooker table overlooking one or more pockets on the snooker table to capture an image of the snooker table as well as a player playing snooker. The board also comprises a second camera mounted under the snooker table having a view of a ball that falls into any of the one or more pockets on the snooker table to capture an image of the ball falling into the pockets; at least one processor configured with the camera to identify a colour of the ball falling into the pockets on the snooker table wherein said processor is configured to: identify the colour of the ball falling into the pocket; calculate a score for each player based on the colour of the ball in the pocket and co-related with the first and second camera captured images to identify a player whose score is counted; announce the score of the player on each increment of the score.
